Loss Given Default of High Loan-to-value Residential Mortgages
Min Qi 2007 This paper studies residential mortgage loss given default using a large set of historical loan-level default and recovery data of high loan-to-value mortgages from several private mortgage insurance companies. We show that loss given default can largely be explained by various characteristics from associated with the loan, the underlying property, and the default, foreclosure, and settlement process. We find that the current loan-to-value ratio is the single most important determinant. More importantly, mortgage loss severity in distressed housing markets is significantly higher than under normal housing market conditions. Our empirical results have important policy implications for risk-based capital.

Crystal Structure of Ideal, Ordered One-layer Micas Rossman F. Giese 1975 Using known interatomic distances, it is possible to construct ideal crystal structures of layer silicates using the distance least squares method (DLS). This approach has been applied to the problem of the atomic arrangement of tetrahedral cation disordered micas by constructing models from
